Korian employees strike against poor working conditions and 'unreasonable management' in Bel-Air, France

Korian's response

To resolve the conflict, Korian decided to set up discussion groups with the help of an external firm. Perrine Lietard, Head of Human Resources at Korian expressed: "We reached a real consensus in just two hours of negotiations. Employees will be able to express themselves freely on their working conditions and on their possible well-being. This will also make it possible to suggest to the administration ways to improve management".

Moreover, each disciplinary action was reviewed on a case-by-case basis, and the employee that no longer has a valid residence permit will be supported in his administrative procedures if necessary.
